PUBLISHER'S NOTE

This booklet represents a paper jointly authored by Professor Khurshid Ahmad and Dr. Zafar Ishaq Ansari (both of Pakistan), while Maulana Maududi was still alive. The paper was later included in a book, Islamic Perspectives: Studies in Honour of Sayyid Abul A'la Maududi, published by the Islamic foundation, Leicester (U.K.) about six months prior to the death of Maulana Maududi which occurred on 22nd September 1979 in U.S.A. where he had gone for treatment. May Allah be kind to him and grant him high station in Paradise!

We feel pleasure in presenting this work which, in a nutshell, gives a good insight into late Maulana Maududi's thinking on and approach to the wide range of contemporary issues concerning Islam and Muslims. This work will be highly useful for those who have not had the opportunity of reading the numerous (over 125) books by Maulana Maududi on a vast variety of subjects and want to know the basics of his ideas which have deeply influenced the new generation of Muslims in many parts of the world.

Foreword

Maulana Sayyid Abul A'la Maududi, the great scholar and leader of the Islamic movement in the Indo-Pakistan subcontinents, was an outstanding personality of our times. His influence extends far beyond the boundaries of Pakistan, where he did make a very perceptible impact on the course of events. Besides making important contributions to Islamic thought in this age, he has inspired a whole new generation of men and women with the ideals of Islam. The movement for the revival of Islam launched by him, Jama'at-e-Islami, ranks among the foremost in the world. No student of modern history can remain indifferent to Maulana Maududi's status and contribution in the current Islamic revival that is steadily emerging in the world, and about which there is a continuously growing need to know more.

It is to cater for this great need that the Islamic Foundation is presenting this booklet. It gives a brief introduction to the life, thought and works of Maulana Maududi. Brothers Khurshid Ahmad and Zafar Ishaq Ansari have made a very successful and commendable effort in encapsulating the large canvas of a rich and varied life and the vast areas of a multi-dimensional world of ideas and thoughts. Also included is a comprehensive bibliography of writings by and about Maulana Maududi, which will prove a valuable tool for research scholars and laymen alike.

This booklet has been taken from a book published by the Islamic Foundation – Islamic Perspectives: Studies in Honour of Sayyid Abul A'la Maududi, edited by Khurshid Ahmad and Zafar Ishaq Ansari. Islamic Perspectives is the result of collaboration and research by several noted scholars of Islam who have made an effort, through this book, to pay their tribute to Maulana Maududi's long-standing record of service to the cause of Islam.

We hope that this booklet, which is being produced as part of a much wider programme of research and publication now being undertaken by the Markazi Maktaba Islami Publishers, will meet the needs of a wide range of readers. We pray to Allah to bless our humble efforts with His grace and acceptance.

Maulana Sayyid Abul A'la Maududi

An Introduction to His Vision of Islam and Islamic Revival

Khurshid Ahmad & Zafar Ishaq Ansari

The two ends of the twentieth century present two different pictures of the Muslim world. At the beginning of this century, the Muslims were under the control of the colonial powers. The Ottoman Empire was disintegrating into oblivion. The balance of world power seemed to have finally settled in favour of the West, condemning the Muslims to a state of political servitude, economic dependence and intellectual and cultural stagnation. Before the First World War, the Muslims were regarded as a world power. After the World War, they seemed to be in the process of being relegated to obscurity and insignificance. Some of the adversaries of Islam thought that its chapter in history had been closed; that the twilight would soon dissolve into darkness. The years and decades that followed have belied the prophets of doom. The inner vitality of Islam proved too strong to be annihilated by the forces of political, intellectual and economic subjugation. Resistance blossomed into resurgence and the tide began to turn. Now in the last quarter of the twentieth century, the Muslim world, despite much in it that is heart-rending presents a somewhat encouraging picture. The chains of political slavery in many parts of the Muslim world have been shattered. The balance of economic power is witnessing new shifts in favour of the Muslims. There is a perceptible disenchantment with man-made ideologies, which had lately begun to cast a spell over Muslims as solvents to man's problems. There is an increasing desire to draw upon the intrinsic resources of Islam to build a new order. What lies, to a large measure, at the root of these political, economic, cultural and intellectual manifestations of resurgence is a rediscovery of the relevance of Islam to the problems and challenges of the time. Undoubtedly, the problems facing the Muslims are formidable and the threats that confront them are legion. It is encouraging, nevertheless, that they are exhibiting a new confidence and vitality in their striving to regain their lost position and to contribute their share in rebuilding the world. This confidence and vitality are reflected in the movements of Islamic revival, which have emerged in different parts of the world during the last fifty years. One of the chief architects of this movement is the quiet and unassuming thinker, reformer and leader, Maulana Sayyid Abul A'la Maududi.

This paper attempts to present a systematic introduction to Maulana Maududi's thought, and the movement, which has arisen on its basis. This has been prefaced by an extremely brief sketch of his life, mainly to serve as the background against which his ideas may be better appreciated.

I. Life¹

Abul A'la was born on Rajab 3, 1321 A.H. /September 25, 1903 C.E. in Aurangabad, a well-known town in the former princely state of Hyderabad (Deccan), presently Andhra Pradesh, India. He was born in a respectable family and his ancestry, on the paternal side, is traced back to the Holy Prophet (peace be on him). The family had a long-standing tradition of spiritual leadership for a number of Maulana Maududi's ancestors were outstanding leaders of Sufi Orders. One of the luminaries among them, the one from whom he derives his family name, was Khwajah Qutb al-Din Maudud (d. 527 A.H.), a renowned leader of the Chishti Sufi Order. Maulana Maududi's ancestors had moved to the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent from Chisht towards the end of the ninth century of the Islamic calendar/15th century of the Christian calendar. The first one to arrive was Maududi's namesake, Abul A'la Maududi (d. 935 A.H.).

Maulana Maududi's father, Ahmad Hasan, born in 1855 C.E., a lawyer by profession, was a highly religious and devout person. Abul A'la was the youngest of his three sons. After acquiring early education at home, he joined a high school called Madarsah Fawqaniyah, which attempted to combine the modern Western with the traditional Islamic education. Abul A'la completed his secondary education successfully and was at the stage of under-graduate studies at Dar-ul-Ulum, Hyderabad when his formal education was disrupted by the illness and then the death of his father. This did not deter Maulana Maududi from continuing his studies, however, though these had to be outside of the regular educational institutions. By the early 1920s, Abul A'la knew enough Arabic, Persian and English, besides his mother tongue, Urdu, to study the subjects of his interest independently. Thus, most of what he learned was self-acquired, though for short spells of time he was able to receive systematic instruction or guidance from some competent scholars. Thus, Maulana Maududi's intellectual growth was largely a result of his own effort and the stimulation he received from his teachers. His moral uprightness, his profound regard for propriety and righteousness, however, largely reflect the religious piety of his parents and their concern for his proper moral upbringing.²

After the interruption of his formal education, Maulana Maududi turned to journalism in order to make his living. In 1918, he was already contributing to a leading Urdu newspaper, and in 1920, at the age of seventeen, he was appointed editor of Taj which was being published from Jabalpure, a city in the province now called Madhya Pradesh, India. Late in 1920, Maulana Maududi came to Delhi and first assumed the editorship of the newspaper Muslim (1921-23), and later of Al-Jam'iyat (1925-28), both of which were organ of the Jam'iyat-e Ulama-e Hind, an organisation of Muslim religious scholars. Under his editorship, Al-Jam'iyat became the leading newspaper of the Muslims of India.

Around the year 1920, Maulana Maududi began to take some interest in politics also. He participated in the Khilafat movement, and was also involved with a secret society, but soon became the disenchanted with the very idea of such societies. Maulana Maududi also became associated with the Tahrir-e Hijrat, which was a movement in opposition to the British rule over India and urged the Muslims of that country to migrate en masse to Afghanistan. However, he fell foul of the leadership of the movement because of his insistence that the aims and strategy of the movement should be realistic and well planned. Maulana Maududi withdrew more and more into academic and journalistic concerns.

During 1920-28, Maulana Maududi translated four different books also, one from Arabic and the rest from English. He also made his mark on the academic life of the subcontinent by writing his first major book, Al-Jihad fil-Islam. This is a masterly treatise on the Islamic law of war and peace. It was first serialised in Al-Jam'iyat in 1927 and was formally published in 1930. It was highly acclaimed both by the famous poet-philosopher Muhammad Iqbal (d.1938) and Maulana Muhammad Ali Jawhar (d.1931), the famous leader of the Khilafat and Independence movements. Though written during his twenties, it remains one of his major and most highly regarded works.

After his resignation from Al-Jam'iyat in 1928, Maulana Maududi moved to Hyderabad and devoted himself to research and writing. It was in this connection that he took up the editorship of the monthly Tarjuman-ul-Qur'an in 1933, which since then has remained the main vehicle for the dissemination of Maulana Maūdudi's ideas. He proved to be a highly prolific writer, turning out several scores of pages every month. Initially he concentrated on an exposition of the ideas, values and basic principles of Islam. He paid special attention to the questions arising out of the conflict between the Islamic and the contemporary Western worldviews. He also attempted to discuss some of the major problems of the modern age and sought to present Islamic solutions to those problems. He also developed a new methodology to study those problems in the context of the experience of the West and the Muslim world. Judging them on the theoretical criterion of their intrinsic soundness and viability and conformity with the teachings of the Qur'an and the Sunnah. His writings disclosed erudition and scholarship, a deep perception of the significance of the teachings of the Qur'an and the Sunnah and a critical awareness of the mainstream of western thought and history. All this brought freshness to his approach and lent a wider appeal to his message.

In the mid-thirties, Maulana Maūdudi started writing on the major political and cultural issues confronting Muslim India at that time and tried to examine them from the Islamic perspective rather than merely from the view-point of short-term political and economic interests. He relentlessly criticised the new-fangled ideologies, which had begun to cast a spell over the minds and hearts of his brethren-in-faith and attempted to show the hollowness of those ideologies. In this connection, the idea of nationalism received concentrated attention from Maulana Maududi when he forcefully explained its dangerous potentialities as well as its incompatibility with the teachings of Islam. Maulana Maududi emphasised also that nationalism in the context of India meant the utter destruction of the collective identity of Muslims. In the meantime, an invitation from the philosopher-poet Muhammad Iqbal persuaded him to leave Hyderabad and settle down at a place, which lay in the Eastern part of Punjab, in the district of Pathankot. Maulana Maududi established what was essentially an academic and research centre called Dar-ul-Islam where, in collaboration with Iqbal, he had planned to train competent scholars in Islamics to produce works of outstanding quality on Islam, and above all, to carry out the reconstruction of Islamic Law.

Around the year 1940, Maulana Maududi developed ideas regarding the founding of a more comprehensive and ambitious movement and this led him to launch a new organisation under the name of the Jama'at-e-Islami. Maulana Maududi, who founded the Jama'at, was elected its chief also and remained so till 1972 when he withdrew from that responsibility for reasons of health.

In 1947, when two independent states were carved out of the subcontinent – Pakistan and India – the Jama'at was divided into the Jama'at-e-Islami Hind and the Jama'at-e-Islami Pakistan. Since August 1947, when Maulana Maududi migrated to Pakistan, he has concentrated his efforts on establishing a truly Islamic state and society in that country. Consistent with this objective, he has written profusely to explain the different aspects of the Islamic way of life, especially the socio-political aspects. This concern for the implementation of the Islamic way of life also led Maulana Maududi to criticise and oppose the policies pursued by the successive governments of Pakistan, and to blame those in power for failing to transform Pakistan into a truly Islamic state. The rulers reacted with severe reprisal measures. Maulana Maududi was often arrested and had to serve long spells in prison.³ During these years of struggle and persecution, Maulana Maududi impressed all, including his critics and opponents, by the firmness and tenacity of his will, and other outstanding qualities. In 1953, when he was sentenced to death by the martial law authorities on the charge of writing a seditious pamphlet on the Qadiyani problem, he resolutely turned down the opportunity to file a petition for mercy. He cheerfully expressed his preference for death to seeking clemency from those who wanted, altogether unjustly, to hang him. With unshakable faith that life and death lie solely in the hands of God, he told his son as well as his colleagues: "If the time of my death has come, no one can keep me from it; and if it has not come, they cannot send me to the gallows even if they hang themselves upside down in trying to do so." His family also declined to make any appeal for mercy. His firmness astonished the Government which was forced, under strong public pressure both from within and without, to commute the death sentence to life imprisonment.⁴

Maulana Maududi is completing nearly sixty years of public life. During these many years, he has been continually active and vocal. He has written over one hundred and twenty books and pamphlets and has made over a thousand speeches and press statements of which at least seven hundred are available on record.⁵

Maulana Maududi's pen is at once prolific, forceful and versatile. The range of subjects he has covered is unusually wide. Disciplines such as Tafsir, Hadith, law, philosophy and history, all have received the due share of his attention. He has discussed a wide variety of problems – political, economic, cultural, social, theological and so on – and has attempted to state how the teachings of Islam are related to those problems. Maulana Maududi has not delved into the technical world of specialist, but has expounded the essentials of the Islamic approach in most of the fields of learning and inquiry. His main contribution, however, has been in the fields of the Qur'anic exegesis (Tafsir), ethics, social studies and the problems facing the international movement of Islamic revival.

His greatest work, however, is his monumental tafsir of the Qur'an in Urdu, Tafhim-ul-Qur'an,⁶ a work he has taken thirty years to complete. Its chief characteristic lies in presenting the meaning and message of the Qur'an in a language and style that penetrates the hearts and minds of the men and women of today and shows the relevance of the Qur'an to their everyday problems, both on the individual and societal planes. He has translated the Qur'an in direct and forceful modern Urdu idiom. His translation is much more readable and eloquent than ordinary literal translations of the Qur'an. He has presented the Qur'an as a book of guidance for human life and as guidebook for the movement to implement and enforce that guidance in human life. He has attempted to explain the verses of the Qur'an in the context of its total message. This tafsir has made a far-reaching impact on contemporary Islamic thinking in the subcontinent, and through its translations, even abroad.

Jama'at-e-Islami, the Islamic movement which Maulana Maududi founded, has grown into a strong and highly organised religio-political organisation which has attracted people from all classes, and has a specially strong influence over the intelligentsia and the youth of the subcontinent.

The influence of Maulana Maududi is not confined, however, to those associated with the Jama'at-e-Islami. That influence transcends the boundaries of parties and organisations, and even goes far beyond the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent. Maulana Maududi has by now become very much like a father figure for Muslims all over the world. As a scholar and writer, he is the most widely read Muslim writer of our time. His books have been translated into most of the major languages of the world – Arabic, English, Turkish, Persian, Hindi, French, German, Swahili, Tamil, Bengali, etc. – and are now increasingly becoming available in many more of the Asian, African and European languages. The several journeys, which Maulana Maududi undertook during the years 1956-74, enabled Muslims in many parts of the world to become acquainted with him personally and appreciate many of his qualities. At the same time, these journeys were educative for Maulana Maududi as well for they provided the opportunity to gain a great deal of first-hand knowledge of the facts of life and to get acquainted with a large number of persons on different parts of the world. During these numerous tours, he has lectured in Cairo, Damascus, Amman, Makka, Madina, Jeddah, Kuwait, Rabat, Istanbul, London, New York, Toronto and a host of other international centres. During these years, he also participated in some ten international conferences. He also made a study tour of Saudi Arabia, Jordan (including Jerusalem), Syria and Egypt in 1959-60 in order to study the geographical aspects of the places mentioned in the Qur'an.⁷ He was also invited to serve on the Advisory Committee which prepared the scheme for the establishment of the Islamic University of Madina and has been on its Academic Council ever since the inception of that University in 1962.

He has also been a member of the foundation Committee of the Rabitah al-alam al-Islami, Makka, and of the Academy of Research on Islamic Law, Madina. In short, he is a tower of inspiration for Muslims the world over. Even though during the last few years, his physical movement has been restricted, for reasons of health, he continues to influence the climate of thought of Muslims, as the Himalayas or the Alps influence the climate in Asia or Europe without themselves moving about.

II. Vision of Islam

The starting point of Maulana Maududi's religious thought is his concept of God. Indeed it is his concept in so far as in recent times he has stressed it perhaps more than others, or else he claims no credit for its originality. In fact, he considers it to be the true, original concept of God as it was expounded by all the prophets and messengers of God. The first part of the basic Islamic confession of faith – "There is no god but Allah" – the statement which might seem to affirm merely the Oneness of the Creator, in Maulana Maududi's view, has implications far beyond what the words of the statement might suggest at first sight. The statement not merely proclaims the unity of God as the Creator or even as the sole object of worship, it also proclaims the uniqueness of God as the Master, Sovereign, Lord and Law-Giver. Essentially God alone has the right to give command, to demand of man's exclusive service and obedience, to claim man's total loyalty. Being the Creator of mankind, God alone has the right to tell man what is the true purpose of his creation, and the way to achieve it. The Islamic statement of faith mentioned above is, therefore, essentially a moral statement; a summon that man responds to Him with his whole being in exclusive service and obedience and devotion and worship.⁸ Maulana Maududi stresses that this total submission to God alone is Islam (a word which, according to its root meaning, denotes submission or surrender). The entire universe is Muslim, i.e. in the state of submission to God since it is subject to the natural laws ordained by God. In the case of the inanimate world, and even in the case of that part of man's being which is beyond his control (e.g. the system operating in his physical organism, etc.), this submission (Islam) is involuntary and constitutes what might be termed as submission to the providential will of God. Man is unique in so far as God has endowed him among other things, with free will and with moral discernment. He can choose to serve God or disobey Him. The service to God envisaged by Islam is, therefore, a voluntary one, denoting man's willing submission to the directives and commands of God.⁹

This concept of God, with its emphasis on His being the sole Sovereign and Law-Giver, provides the basic principle of authority. All principles, laws, customs and usage, which are contrary to the directives of God, are to be spurned. All theories or doctrines which claim that in disregard of Divine guidance, man himself has the right to be it as an individual or a group of persons, or a nation or even all humanity combined – to decide what is good or bad for mankind, are indeed to be regarded as denying the Sovereignty of God and as setting up gods other than the One True God. Submission to God means bringing the entire life of man into harmony with the revealed Will of God.¹⁰

As for man, he is God's creature, and hence is bound to the service and obedience of God. Not only that, God has chosen man, in the words of the Qur'an, for the unique distinction of His vicegerency on earth. Each human being is endowed with the trust of vicegerency from God and is accountable to Him in that regard. In his capacity as God's vicegerent, man is also committed to his Principal – God – to administer the affairs of the world in strict accordance with the latter's directives, and to exercise all his powers – which after all have been conferred upon him by God – within the limits prescribed by Him.¹¹

The question remains: In what manner should man submit to God? How should he come to know the commands and directives of God which he is required to follow? The answer to this question lies in the doctrine of prophethood, a doctrine which is an essential supplement to the doctrine of the Sovereignty of God. Maulana Maududi dwells at length upon prophethood and considers it God's response to man's perennial need for guidance.¹² Because of the perennality of this need, prophethood began with the beginning of human life on earth. The first man was also the first Prophet.¹³ And since it was the need of all mankind, prophets are not the special prerogative of any particular race or region. According to the Qur'an, prophets were raised in all parts of the world. They were recipients of certain basic truths, which were communicated to them by the extra-ordinary means of revelation. They were required to communicate and practise them, and summon people to the absolute service of God. All these prophets as well as their followers were Muslims (submitters to the Will of God). The divine guidance, which they taught, was revealed in its final and perfected form to Muhammad (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam) who not only communicated it to others, but also practised it himself and successfully built up a society and state on its basis. This Divine guidance is embodied in its pristine form in the Qur'an and in the Sunnah of Muhammad (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam). Operationally speaking, therefore, since the advent of the Holy Prophet (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam), submission to God means commitment and striving to follow the norms embodied in the Qur'an and the Sunnah.¹⁴

In addition to providing Divine guidance to mankind, the prophets were also required to purify the lives of men, and to strive to establish the sovereignty of God. All prophets aimed at doing so and attained varying degrees of success. The nature of their mission brought them into conflict with the powers that were, for rulers tend to arrogate to themselves sovereignty which, in the view of the prophets, belongs to none save God. The real dispute between the prophets and their peoples, or the rulers of their time (Pharaoh, Nimrod, etc.) was not as to whether God exists or not. The existence of God as the Creator has been a commonly accepted fact. The point in dispute was: Who is their real Ruler and Master? Whom ought they to regard as their Law-Giver? Whose commands ought they to follow?¹⁵ Likewise, the 'Ibadah' to which prophets invited people did not consist merely of performing acts of prayer and worship. It embraced acceptance of the Lord as the supreme object of loyalty, and commitment to obey and follow His command and to do His will.¹⁶

Maulana Maududi emphasises that there are two basically different, in fact mutually opposed, attitudes to life; one, of accepting God as the Sovereign and Law - Giver and as such responding to Him as His slave and servant, the other, of defiance and rebellion against God, and arrogation to oneself or to others than the One True God of the authority to command.¹⁷

The prophets challenged this latter attitude and invited mankind to the path of submission to One God. This erroneous attitude, the essence of which is to deny the overriding authority of the prophetic guidance in human life, is termed by Maulana Maududi as Jahiliyah, (a term which is only a pale reflection of the original when translated as "Ignorance"). It is so termed since true knowledge regarding the right principles, which ought to regulate human life, can be derived from no other source than the revealed guidance communicated to human beings by the prophets. Now, Jahiliyah, has different shapes and forms, and is thus possessed of considerable internal diversity. It remains Jahiliyah, nevertheless, in each of these shapes and forms and Maulana Maududi puts it in category, which is fundamentally antithetical to Islam.¹⁸

Islam can never become a living reality unless the dominance of Jahiliyah is ended. The prophets and their true followers, therefore, engaged in a striving which also aims at putting an end to the hegemony of Jahiliyah. This lends a revolutionary character to their struggle.¹⁹

Another major point of Maulana Maududi's emphasis is that the guidance embodied in the Qur'an and the Sunnah embraces the entire life of man. Maulana Maududi has opposed hardly anything as vehemently as the attitude of considering Islam an entirely personal relationship between man and God, or merely a set of metaphysical doctrines, or just a body of rituals. Again and again he points out that Islam is a way of life, and that it is a complete comprehensive way of life. Neither trade nor industry, neither governmental affairs nor international relations, neither civil nor penal laws, in short, no aspect of human life can claim an autonomous status and thus fall beyond the jurisdiction of Islam. A Muslim is not only required to submit to God in places of worship, but in all places and at all times—in his home and on the street, on the battlefield and around the conference table, in schools and colleges and universities, in centres of business and finance, and so on and so forth.²⁰ For service to God is not confined to a few defined acts. Man's whole life should be an act of devotion and service to God, for every act of man whereby he seeks the good pleasure of God and wherein he remains heedful of the directives of God is an act of devotion and service to God.²¹ Since Divine guidance embodies the infinite knowledge, wisdom and benevolence of God, the principles which go to make the Islamic way of life are sound and healthy, as well as incomparably superior to all man-made systems. Man's intellect and reason have great achievements in certain fields, e.g. in the field of natural sciences and technology. But human reason, unaided by Divine guidance, is altogether inadequate to lay down the principles, which can do full justice to all the different aspects of man's nature and conduce to his true happiness. At any given period of history, the sum total of knowledge and wisdom available to man is too meagre to prescribe the true way of life for man. This task has been rendered even more difficult by the fact that animal desires and passions and different biases and narrow interests affect man's reason and distort his vision. It owes to such factors that human reason constantly keeps swerving between different extremes. Such extremes become clearly evident if we were to consider the position men have taken on questions such as those concerning the relative rights of the individual and of society, the appropriate position and role of men and women, the relationship between labour and capital.²² Maulana Maududi points out that the Hegelian dialectics – the emergence of a thesis, then its anti-thesis in, followed by a synthesis which combines the former extremes – is partly correct, though to say so is merely to make a statement of fact and has no normative value. The emergence of an extremist anti-thesis in reaction to a perhaps equally one-sided extremist thesis only illustrates the fickleness of human reason when its embarks independently on the venture of laying down the set of norms and values which could lead to truly good human life.²³ It is for this reason that the Islamic way of life as laid down in the Qur'an and the Sunnah is superior and much more conducive to man's happiness and self-fulfilment in this world – let alone to his salvation in the Hereafter – than any man-made systems of life, whether of the past, or of the present.²⁴

Far from having any apologetic feeling for Islam because of the global dominance of the civilisation actuated by norms and values quite foreign to Islam, Maulana Maududi considers the Islamic way of life just as necessary today for the salvation of contemporary man as it was for man in former times. He appreciates the scientific and technological achievements and the vigour shown in general by the Western civilisation during the past few centuries. At the same time, he thinks that the Western civilisation does not possess the right sense of direction, and is inherently rotten because of the falsity of its foundational principles. The fundamental fault of that civilisation – the fault that lies at the basis of all its other evils – is that it is based on man's independence of, and indifference to, Divine guidance. Modern man has gradually come to point where he neither considers it necessary to follow God's guidance, nor feels that he is answerable to God for his conduct. And if any at all are conscious of the need to follow God's guidance, then the purview of that guidance is confined to a very narrow sphere of man's life, allowing human caprices, biases and concern with narrow interests to play havoc with human life. Deprived of Divine guidance, the modern man conceives of himself as merely an animal that is equipped with the capacity of reasoning. Instead of clearly defined moral standards man has come to have an overwhelmingly utilitarian view of morals. This, in effect, promotes, rather than serves as a brake on an unbridled pursuit of personal or group self-interest. The human family has been split into a multiplicity of nations with strong feelings of mutual alienation and hostility tearing at the ideal of the universal brotherhood of man. Rather than that love and co-operation are promoted, self and group aggrandisement are held up as natural phenomena and rational objectives of human effort, leading to irreconcilable strife and conflict, in economic, social and political spheres of life. Rather than that family ties are strengthened, and the human home made the nursery for the cultivation of some of the most precious moral virtues, the craze for sensual pleasure has given rise to modes of social behaviour which are destroying the very bases of family life and are robbing man of purity of feelings and character. All the "isms" which have arisen in the present age, despite their mutual disagreements, have arisen from the same basic philosophy – that man rather than God has the right to prescribe the goal of human life and the norms for human conduct. Being contrary to basic truths, these are morally unsound and historically disastrous.²⁵

Maulana Maududi emphasises that the putrescence of the modern civilisation is becoming increasingly clear to the intelligent and sensitive people of the world. The present civilisation, he feels, is moving along the road to collapse and disintegration. And if none comes forward with a constructive vision and offers alternative principles for developing a new order, the entire world might slide into the abyss of a frightful Dark Age. This makes it all the more necessary that the Islamic way of life in all its fullness – its metaphysical doctrines, its principles of personal behaviour and social conduct, as well as the principles of organising a sound and healthy economy and state should be spelled out and put into practice.²⁶

What this calls for is not merely a concerted activity aimed at the cultivation of a set of moral virtues. Maulana Maududi's vision essentially is that of carrying out a total reconstruction of human life and establishing a new social order and state, and thereby ushering in a new era in human history.

A major question that one faces in connection with the task of carrying out an Islamic reconstruction of human life in the present age is: what should be our attitude towards the modern Western civilisation and its achievements? In this connection, Maulana Maududi mentions that the contact of Muslim society with modern Western civilisation has generally given birth to two reactions, each of which he considers inadequate. The first reaction was a defeatist one, that of according an indiscriminate welcome to all that was labelled as "modern" – the Western outlook on life, Western legal codes, Western style of life, Western custom of social behaviour, Western political doctrines and institutions, Western economic ideologies, and so on. In several respects contact with the West and in fact even this defeatist reaction has done the Muslim some good. This contact has shattered the closed, static outlook of the Muslims, has widened their horizons, and has, to some extent, enabled them to come to grips with the problems of the present age. But these benefits are far outweighed by the harm caused by the defeatist outlook. For, by encouraging indiscriminate westernisation, this attitude threatens to erode the Islamic identity and to rob Islam of its effectiveness as a force guiding the life of man.

The other extremist reaction was the one termed by Maulana Maududi as "static". It appeared as a result of the operation of the defensive impulse in Muslim society. This reaction made people feel that unless the entire heritage, which had come down to them from their ancestors, was jealously preserved, Islam would be obliterated. Such people made little attempt to distinguish between the healthy and the unhealthy components of this heritage. They hardly bothered to explore what had led to the decline and downfall of the Muslims, and what were the factors, which had enabled the western nations to surpass and overwhelm them. The obsession of the antiquarian and the tendency of the blindly conservative to oppose every change, to cling to every item coming down from the past seized these Muslims. Maulana Maududi is emphatic that the normative and immutable part of the Muslim heritage consists of the principles of the Qur'an and the Sunnah, and nothing else. The Qur'an and the Sunnah are the touchstone for our judgement – for judging what the Muslims did in the past as well as what they are doing at present. Muslim history indeed has a great deal to fill a Muslim's heart with pride. But the acts of human beings – even of human beings motivated by the best of intentions – are not necessarily normative for all Muslims. In fact, Maulana Maududi is quite critical of much that has taken place in the past and often points out the failings of different sections of Muslim society – rulers, scholars, spiritual leaders, and so on. And even when the people of the past had made sound decisions, those decisions cannot be considered indiscriminately binding on Muslims for all times to come.

It should be clear from this that his outlook is distinct from the outlook of the so-called conservatives. He urges that the Muslim heritage (which is naturally a complex composite of truly Islamic and non-Islamic, of healthy and unhealthy elements) should be subjected to critical examination and careful analysis. Thereafter only those elements which are demonstrably derived from the Qur'an and the Sunnah should be considered of permanent value. Likewise, the Western civilisation should be subjected to a critical scrutiny and analysis. The Western philosophy of life, the Western standard of evaluation, and the corruption and errors, which have plagued the Western social life, should definitely be discarded. But this should not prevent Muslims from abstracting the healthy achievements of the modern West – its sciences, its technology, its techniques of efficient organisation and administration. There is no harm in appropriating these elements, as long as they are value-free and can be assimilated in the Islamic scheme of life. They are in fact a part of the common heritage of all mankind to which all nations, including Muslims, have contributed. Such a step is also necessary in so far as the true objective of the Muslims cannot be merely to foster belief in certain doctrines and promote certain moral virtues. It should rather be to make the entire scheme of life envisaged by Islam a living reality in the changed circumstances of the present age.²⁷

The above brings out a major and overridingly important facet of Maulana Maududi's vision of Islamic religious life. This evidently relates largely to man's outward behaviour, especially on the societal plane. Were one to borrow the jargon of the philosophers of religion, one would perhaps say that the above depicts, in the main, how man ought to respond to God in His transcendence. Since the principles and values of Islam relating to the socio-economic and political spheres of life had become relegated to oblivion, it is understandable that Maulana Maududi felt called upon to emphasise those principles and values and to spell them out with a great deal of detail. Perhaps for this reason the rich inwardness of religious life, man's innate yearning to strive for proximity with the Divine, the restless striving of man's soul to reach out to the One Who is at once elusive to the senses and yet is nearer than his neck-vein, does not seem to have been emphasised to the same degree. Or, once again to borrow the jargon of the philosophers of religion, the way man ought to respond to the immanence of God does not come out with equally compelling force. This becomes understandable when we recall that this facet of religious life had already received considerable emphasis in Muslim society, not least in the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent where Maulana Maududi was born grew up and lived. Moreover, even the outstandingly religious Muslims had begun to forget, and thus had to be reminded, that God is not only to be loved and feared and worshipped; but being man's Sovereign Lord and Law-Giver his devotion to the Creators should also impel him to follow His directives and obey His commands in all spheres of life and to strive for the supremacy of His world. In a way, this cause for a stronger, and at least a different kind of allegiance and commitment to God, and is inconceivable without a rich and profound kind of spirituality.

Be that as it may, this aspect does come up in Maulana Maududi's writings, to which we refer here briefly in order to have a more balanced concept of his vision of Islamic life. We are taking up here Maulana Maududi's views regarding Iman (faith) to illustrate approach inner, experiential, and a more conspicuously personalist, aspect of the religious life. In several of his writings, Maulana Maududi emphasises the centrality of faith in man's religious life.²⁸ Faith, "full in expanse and firmly rooted in depth" is, in Maulana Maududi's view, an indispensable base for a truly Islamic life.²⁹

Faith ties man in a strong relationship of fidelity to one's Creator, and without that pulsating relationship all outwardly religious acts are futile and barren. Islam in Maulana Maududi's view is concerned both with the apparent and observable conduct of man, the outward fulfilling of a duty, as well as with the spirit of that conduct,³⁰ which is rooted in faith. Faith impels man to turn to God with a throbbing heart, to focus his attention upon Him as his chief object of love and devotion, as well as that of obedience, service and worship, and to hold Him dearer than everything and everyone else. Faith gives man a deep sense of self-fulfilment, and a profound feeling of inner happiness in moving closer to the Divine and carrying out His behest. According to Maulana Maududi, inevitable demand of Tawhid is that "the sole purpose of all human endeavour... in the worldly life should be to seek the good pleasure of God".³¹ Thus once a person has faith, the basis of Islamic life is laid. The spiritual life of a person can, however, be rich or poor, it can rise to very sublime heights or remain on a low, ordinary plane, depending largely on the degree of genuineness and intensity of the faith of the person concerned.

Genuine faith, as distinguished from its verbal confession, leads man to shape his conduct according to God's command. Faith is the propelling power to do God's will, the motivating force which changes what are apparently physical movements into rich acts of communion with the Divine. Thus Islam – one's actual submission to God's commands – is a manifestation of faith (Iman); the former being the superstructure which rises on a foundation of the latter. "The mutual relationship between faith and Islam", says Maulana Maududi, "is that between the seed and its tree."³² If man has faith, he can rise to ever-higher stages of spiritual growth. One of these stages in his spiritual growth is piety (taqwa). Maulana Maududi does not consider piety to consist merely of observing the familiar outward forms of the so-called pietistic behaviour – wearing a special kind of dress adopting an ascetic attitude towards life, etc. In his view, piety rather "refers to that state of the soul which is born out of the fear of God and a sense of responsibility... which manifests itself in all aspects of one's life."³³

The highest stage of man's spiritual growth is characterised by Maulana Maududi as Ihsan (state of spiritual excellence), a term which occurs in a well-known tradition of the Holy Prophet (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam).³⁴ Ihsan, Maulana Maududi emphasises, represents man's most profound attachment to God and His messenger and the religion that He has prescribed for man. It denotes that deep love, that sincere allegiance and that spirit of self-sacrifice, which make one lose oneself entirely in one's devotion to God. "The essence of Ihsan", as distinguished from Ihsan, whose propelling force is a fear of God, "is the love of God which impels man to win God's favour."³⁵ "Ihsan means that man's will becomes one with God's. Whatever pleases God, please his servant as well; whatever displeases God, also displeases his servant." This, however, is not just a passive state of the heart, like Iman and Islam, Ihsan also has an activist signification in Maulana Maududi's thinking. It leads one to strive for the promotion of good and the obliteration of evil with a strong sense of allegiance to and love for God, making one fearless of everything else. "Those evils whose existence God does not desire on His earth, His servant not only avoids, but also strives to extirpate from the world with all his Power and resources."³⁶ He also does his utmost, even at the risk of his life, to foster the virtues with which God desires to beautify His world. "When a man reaches this stage", says Maulana Maududi, "he enjoys the closest possible proximity with God and this is, therefore, the highest stage of his spiritual growth."³⁷

III. Vision of Islamic Revival

The earlier section gives an idea of the key concepts in Maulana Maududi's Understanding of Islam. These concepts are equally vital for comprehending his vision of Islamic revival.

(a) View of History

In this connection, it is also essential to keep in mind Maulana Maududi's view regarding history in general, and Muslim history since the advent of the Holy Prophet (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam) in particular. History is seen by Maulana Maududi to consist essentially of a perpetual struggle between Islam and Jahiliyah. As we have noted earlier, Maulana Maududi employs the term Jahiliyah as the antithesis of Islam. He applies this term to all world views and systems of thought, belief and action, which deny God's sovereignty, and the authority of Divine guidance. There can be, and indeed there have been many combinations and permutations of Jahiliyah. There is, first of all, the pure Jahiliyah, consisting of a total denial of the realm of the super-sensory or super-natural. Then there is a wide variety of partial or mixed Jahiliyahs. These consist of recognition of the existence of the Creator, but that is mixed with other false beliefs, thereby adulterating certain elements of Divine guidance with other false elements. These partial or mixed Jahiliyahs are at times inclined to an exaggerated spirituality, which generates attitudes of world-renunciation. On other occasions, Jahiliyah assumes an exaggerated mystical form which carries man's inherent devotion to the Divine to monistic and pantheistic directions, to blur the distinction between the Creator and the created; and so on and so forth.³⁸

Islam is opposed to Jahiliyah in all its shapes and forms and it seeks to bring about a total revolution in human life aimed at fashioning it according to Divine guidance. This revolution begins by providing man with a set of beliefs, an outlook on life, a concept of reality, a new scale of values, a fresh moral commitment, and a transformation of his motivation and personality. This inaugurates a catalytic process resulting in a whole series of changes in the lives of individuals, leading those individuals to develop a community of faith. The community grows as an ideological movement, engaged in bringing about social change in the desired direction. This effort aims at the reconstruction of human life as a whole and leads to the building of a new society and state, to the establishment of a new order, an order which in its ideal form is characterised by Maulana Maududi as Khilafah A'la Minhaj al-Nubuwwah (Caliphate on the Prophetic pattern), and serves as the ideal pattern of socio-political order which Muslims ought to try to actualise in their lives.³⁹

On the basis of these premises, Maulana Maududi builds a conceptual framework to analyse the genuine movement towards Islamic revival on the one hand, and the efforts that are made to bring about compromise with Jahiliyah in the name of Islam, on the other. Within the overall framework of the struggle between Islam and Jahiliyah there are two poles around which different efforts cluster. On the one end is Tajdid – an effort to re-establish Islam in its pristine purity and to reconstruct the fabric of life and society in a given space-time context in accordance with Islamic values and principles. The other pole is represented by Tajaddud, which assumes, among others, any or all of the following three forms:

- (i) There develops an excessive concern for material interests, for territorial conquests, etc. in disregard of the true moral spirit of Islam. This destroys the balance that Islam seeks to establish between the spiritual and material aspects of life;

- (ii) Compromise is made with the spirit and form of the dominant Jahiliyah of the age, which leads to the emergence of a new mixture of Islam and Jahiliyah;
- (iii) The values, principles and modes of conduct are taken over from non-Islamic societies but an Islamic façade is maintained, usually by employing Islamic terminology to characterise these borrowings.⁴⁰

(b) Objectives and Strategy of Islamic Revival⁴¹

Although both these approaches are characterised by dynamism, the objectives of Islamic revolution are achieved only through Tajdid and not Tajaddud. Tajdid represents a continuation of the mission of the prophets to implement Islam. It flows from a firm conviction, from an uncompromising resolve to do the Will of God. Its spirit is one of creativity. It is inspired by high ambition, though the effort itself might, indeed should, be made with great caution and realism, and is accompanied with full moral and material preparation. In this kind of striving an effort is made to avoid extremes and to see that the Islamic principles are realised in form as well as in spirit. This involves three preliminary steps:

- (i) An analysis of the situation as it prevails in relation to conflict between Islam and Jahiliyah in a given space-time context. A clear and straightforward appraisal of the situation is necessary in order to know the forms Jahiliyah has assumed, the sources from which it is being nourished and the sensitive points on which tensions and conflicts exist between Islam and Jahiliyah. The sources of weakness in contemporary Muslim life should also be examined and a sound diagnosis should be made so that one is clear about the major ailments from which Muslim society suffers at a given period of history.

- (ii) The chief objective of this intellectual effort should be to hammer out a strategy, based on the above analysis, in order that Islamic principles once again become operative in the lives of the Muslims.
- (iii) For the preparation of a realistic strategy it is also essential to examine the resources that are available at a given period of time. It is only in the light of self-evaluation and a careful assessment of the mental, moral and material resources available that a blueprint for revival can be worked out. The effort must harness the most effective means available for the achievement of the above-mentioned objective.

What should be the major elements of this strategy? Since Islam stands for total change and the ultimate objective is the establishment of the ideal Islamic order (Khilafah A'la Minhaj al-Nubuawah) This programme would have at least the following elements:

- (a) The ideals and principles of Islam should be restated in a language understandable to the people of the age. This necessitates that the Jahiliyah concepts in vogue at a given period of time should be carefully studied, analysed and subjected to criticism. Islamic principles should be presented in such a manner that their relevance, and their superiority over the principles propounded by false, man-made ideologies, becomes self-evident. This would require vigorous intellectual effort so that both the theoretical and practical implications of the Islamic worldview are clearly spelled out and the Islamic way of life in all its ramifications is crystallised.

- (b) The moral fibre of the life of the people should be rebuilt so as to develop a true Islamic character in them and involve them in a striving aimed at bringing about reform and reconstruction. Social habits, customs, education, socio-economic institutions, and political Power – all ought to be sub-ordinated to this effort. Social life ought to be freed from perverse innovations (bid'ah) which run counter to the spirit of Islam, and should be so restructured as to conform to the Sunnah.
- (c) The entire exercise involves ijtihad fi al-din. This means that the ideals, values and principles of Islam will have to be reapplied to the changed context. A clear understanding of Islamic ideals and the Islamic scheme of priorities, and careful differentiation between the essential and the incidental elements found in the actual life of Muslims are crucial to this exercise.

Ijtihad represents the principle of movement within the system of Islam and it involves creative thinking and action with a view to bringing the stream of life under the guidance of Islam. Ijtihad at the intellectual level is to be accompanied by jihad (struggle) at the practical level. Both ought to be combined so that the Muslims have, on the one hand, clarity of vision regarding their objectives and the mechanics to achieve them, and on the other hand, the resolve and the energy needed to actualise those objectives.

This brings us to consider the position of the person who articulates the implications of the Islamic way of life, who resorts outstandingly to both creative intellectual and practical effort in order to transform Islam into living reality. The impact of his personality is important and serves as a major catalyst in a given space-time context. Despite the impact of the personality of the initiator of Islamic revival, the movement that is launched need not be, in fact should not be, personality-centred. For, in Islam there exists sanction for the religious authority of none except a prophet. What is needed is a social movement and much would depend, as far as the results are concerned, upon the quality of the leadership that pilots it and the way it is organised.

In the past movements have often hovered round the charismatic personalities of the Mujaddids. But in modern times properly organised bodies can play the same role. In fact, in order to achieve total change it is necessary that an organised movement should be launched which should culminate in the establishment of a state committed to this mission.

(c) Application of the Model of Contemporary Situation⁴²

Maulana Maududi's own analysis of the contemporary situation is that the Muslim society has gradually drifted away from the ideal order established by the Prophet (Sallallahu Alaihi Wasallam), which had continued and developed along the same line during period of Khulafa-e-Rashidin. The first important change in the body politic of Islam was a change from Khilafah to a more or less worldly monarchy with very important consequential changes affecting the role of religion in the socio-political life. Gradually the very idea of unity of life began to be weakened, and consciously or unconsciously a degree of separation between religion and politics was brought about.

There also developed a bifurcation of leadership into political and religious leadership, with separate domains and areas of influence for each.

The second major change occurred in the system of education. This had catastrophic consequences as it began to perpetuate the schisms and tensions that were shearing Muslim society and gradually sapped the springs of creativity which had ensured the vitality of the Islamic civilisation in all major realms of human effort.

As a consequence of the above changes, the moral life of the people began to deteriorate; their faithful allegiance and sincere devotion to Islam weakened, and a gap between theory and practice began to appear and widen, leading to the strengthening of the moral disease of nifaa (hypocrisy). Widespread efforts were made throughout Muslim history to rectify this situation. But the rot continued till Muslims succumbed to the colonial powers of the West. During this period an alien system was imposed upon them in all fields of life, including the field of education. Because of this new system of education the separation of religion and politics in practical life gradually became an acceptable proposition for Muslim society. When the Muslims threw off the yoke of foreign dominance and began living as independent people, the leadership of the Muslim countries generally passed into the hands of those whose mental attitudes and life styles had been shaped by the colonial system of education and their experience of political subjection. These leaders have hardly any real understanding of Islam. They are living, by and large, under the spell of non-Islamic ideas and values. This is in addition to the several weaknesses inherited by Muslims from earlier periods of their history. At the present, some of the major failings of Muslim society seem to be the lack of adequate knowledge of Islam, nifaa, the weakening of Islamic moral values, the tensions between the leadership and the masses, and the disruption of the socio-political order of Islam. The general mass of people loves Islam but do not understand its meaning and message properly. The leadership, in its wider sense, is in the hands of those who are not prepared to submit themselves fully to the Islamic scheme of life; nor do they have any clear vision of the Islamic order. This had led the Muslim society to be rent by strife between two systems; the Islamic system, and the system of modern Jahiliyah, which derives its inspiration from contemporary Western civilisation. This civilisation, as we all know, is based on the principle of effecting separation between religion and man's practical life, and tends to erect the socio-economic structure of man's life, in fact tends to handle his mundane affairs as such without any reference to God or to His will or law. How can the situation be redressed? Maulana Maududi's answer would be through faith and continuous struggle.

Maulana Maududi has devoted a great deal to developing a comprehensive programme that would change Pakistan into an ideal Islamic society and state. The organisation of which he has been the chief, the Jama'at-e-Islami has been the main instrument through which he has tried to implement this programme.

Before we discuss that programme, it seems necessary to spell out a major assumption on which Maulana Maududi's movement is based. The assumption is that the intellectuals play a crucial role in every human society, but especially in modern society. He has emphasised that Islam will become an operative reality in our times when men possessed of faith and integrity and a clear vision of the Islamic order, people who are in the vanguard of man's intellectual life and have the competence to run the affairs of the world assume the reins of leadership. The term leadership is generally used in a broad sense, and might be said to refer to those who are the pacesetters of a society; those who count and are imitated by others. Broadly speaking, they belong to the educated class, out of whom those who happen to control the organs of the state play an even more effective role in human life. Maulana Maududi likens the role of the leadership to that of the driver of a railway train. The driver, he says, is in a position to carry the train wherever he wishes to (unless of course the passengers have that driver replaced by another one). This emphasis on the importance of the ruling class in modern society is also the result of the consciousness that nowadays the state plays a far greater role, and affects the lives of ordinary men and women much more than it used to do in the past. Having at its disposal the control of education, of the mass media, of economic life, the efforts to bring about any changes in human life are foredoomed to failure unless the state were to co-operate in those efforts.

Bearing this assumption in mind we now move on to elaborating the programme propounded by Maulana Maududi, which clusters around four points:

- (1) The first major point of this programme is an intellectual one, viz. A clear exposition of the teachings of Islam which is shorn of all false ideas and purged of all unhealthy accretions. This exposition should also be geared to showing how the teachings of Islam can be applied in the present-day world, and what steps should be taken so as to develop a sound and healthy order of life. This would necessitate a stock-taking both of the Muslim heritage and of modern civilisation, followed by a discriminate appropriation of healthy elements from them. So far as the teachings of the Qur'an and the Sunnah are concerned, they are eternally binding and should thus be followed by the Muslims in all periods of history.

Maulana Maududi is also conscious of the need for the renewal of Islamic thought. In this connection, he makes the significant observation that Muslim society has lost a great deal of its original dynamism and elan because it has lost sight of the original order of priorities: viz. the Qur'an, the Sunnah and Ijtihad. The Muslims, he feels, have reversed this order. They now turn, in the first place, to the opinion of the scholars of the past, to the results of their ijtihad. It is only after looking into the opinions of the jurists that we turn to the Qur'an and the Sunnah. This has stultified the Muslim mind. The original dynamism can be recaptured only if the Muslims decide to replace the present by the original order of priorities. This means that we ought to look first to the Qur'an, then to the Sunnah, and after that to the deductive elaborations of the jurists and to the ideas propounded by other Muslim thinkers.

- (2) The second item of the programme is to reach out to the persons who are disposed to righteousness, and are inclined to work for the establishment and enthronement of righteousness in human life. Such persons should be identified and brought together into an organised body. Not only that, an effort should also be made to help such people develop a clear outlook, to purify their lives, and cultivate the qualities of good moral character. It is only after a group of people, which combines true Islamic vision and Islamic character side by side with intellectual competence and with the skill needed to run the affairs of this world, emerges on the stage of human history, pools its strength and resources, and strives in a systematic manner that God will permit the Islamic Order to be established. Hence, Maulana Maududi tries to emphasise the necessity of maintaining an inner core of highly dedicated and conspicuously upright men as the foundation of Islamic revival. Quality is not to be sacrificed at the altar of quantity. The reason for it is, to borrow from Charles J. Adams, in Maulana Maududi's opinion, "the best way to transform a society is by the creation of a small, informed, dedicated and disciplined group," the creation of "a righteous group, a saving element...which would leaven the whole lump of society".⁴³ This group, however, is not to remain stationary. It should rather expand by persuading others to share its viewpoint and co-operate in the struggle to establish the supremacy of justice and righteousness.

- (3) The third point of the programme consists of striving to bring about societal change, to effect reform in the light of Islamic teachings. The idea is that the people who are dedicated to the cause of Islam, or at least have an Islamic orientation and a concern for the well-being of human society should take the initiative and expend their time, effort and resources to bring about maximum healthy change and improvement. This programme of societal reform is quite a comprehensive one. It seeks to make the mosque the hub of all Islamic activity. Moreover, there is heavy emphasis on education: the basic teachings of Islam should be communicated to the common people, arrangements should be made for adult education, reading rooms should be opened to create enlightenment, and educational institutions should be established at different levels. In the area of social life, the programme emphasises resort to public pressure to prevent people from being subjected to injustice; creating sense of hygiene and cleanliness and fostering co-operation among people so as to ensure healthy conditions of living; drawing up lists of orphans and widows, of the crippled and the incapacitated people, and of poor students and arranging for their financial assistance; and catering for the health requirements of people, especially the poor. Clearly, inspired by Islamic ideals, the objective is to foster the religious, moral, social and material welfare of the people and to move towards creating the social conditions which conducive to the total transformation of human life.

- (4) The fourth point of the programme envisages change of leadership in the broader sense of the term. It includes intellectual leadership, social and cultural leadership, and ultimately also political leadership. The last mentioned marks the culmination of the process. The state is conceived as an indispensable means for establishing the order envisaged by Islam. A truly Islamic state is considered inconceivable unless people of clear Islamic vision and commitment, and upright character and competence direct its affairs.

How can this change of leadership be brought about? So far as non-political leadership is concerned, perhaps a great deal can be done by developing leadership qualities in people who are possessed of right orientation. Maulana Maududi's always kept this in mind as one of his aims. As for the change of political leadership, in a democratic order this can possibly be brought about through general elections. Maulana Maududi has been hopeful that if the Islamic movement keeps on striving patiently, it will ultimately succeed in installing righteous men in power. He is also convinced that the democratic structure is congenial to the Islamic State. He also thinks that the democratic order will provide the framework in which an Islamic movement can flourish, gather strength and bring about the total transformation that it aims at. For all these reasons, Maulana Maududi cast his weight in favour of the establishment and maintenance of a truly democratic order in Pakistan.

(d) Revolution or Reform?

Maulana Maududi has frequently used the term "revolution" to denote the radical change that he seeks to bring about. The use of this term has not created in him any fondness for the process or the method by which some of the revolutionary movements of modern times have tried to effect their cherished changes.

In critical study of the French Revolution, the Russian Revolution and the Kamalist Revolution in Turkey, Maulana Maududi shows that the Western revolutionary approaches have swung between extremes. What is common, however, to the contemporary revolutionary movements is the assumption that if the socio-economic or political framework, the material and social setting of human life is changed, a radical change for the better can be brought about. These revolutionaries have neglected the problem of changing man himself: his outlook, the goal of his life, his motivation, and his personality. Islamic revolution seeks a much more radical, a much more profound change. This change includes, and primarily so, the man, the individual, who is to serve as a solid base for the new order.

Revolutions have also resorted to making use of hatred and wide-scale violence and have not confined the use of force to the unavoidable and morally justifiable minimum. Maulana Maududi disapproves of the so-called revolutionary techniques and emphasises that Islamic revival can be brought about through a different set of "revolutionary" tactics. While the ultimate aim is to effect total change, the advance to that goal should be gradual and well calculated. Instead of bluntly reacting against the entire prevalent system — against every single item of it — and striving to destroy it immediately and totally, he pleads for a restrained approach. He wants the prevailing system to be carefully examined with a view to finding out what is malignant and hence deserves to be changed and what is healthy and as such deserves to be preserved. He suggests that those who seek to bring about change should proceed the way a surgeon approaches his patient, using his surgical instruments only to the extent that their use is necessary to get rid of the undesirable part of the organism. Moreover, while he considers the Islamic approach to be revolutionary, in the sense that the new order it wants to establish would be basically different from the present order, and the change it envisages is total and complete, Islam seeks to bring about this transformation gradually, through a set of careful and calculated moves. This is in addition to his opposition to the dictum, quite acceptable to both the revolutionaries and non-revolutionaries of our time: "ends justify means". He emphasises, on the contrary, that both the ends and the means ought to be clean and commendable, for only thus can a healthy order take shape.

Under the influence of Maulana Maududi's ideas a considerable amount of activity is visible in different parts of the world. In the subcontinent in particular, a movement is at work to give a practical shape to his vision of Islamic revival. It would perhaps be a bit too early and especially for those who are in one way or another involved in the movement launched under his inspiration, to make evaluative judgements. What is significant is that a process of change has already begun to operate. Only the future will show whether that process is strong enough to transform the Muslim society to any significant degree in the near future or if it will only yield some new seeds for efforts in the future. Much will depend, in any case, on the extent of dedication, integrity and wisdom of the men and women associated with that movement. Maulana Maududi's contribution lies in initiating a process of change markedly inspired by Islamic ideals in an age, which appeared to be insensitive, let alone unresponsive to God.
